Killed Ten Blowing Vipers.

John Householder, of this place, has rid Marshall county of a nest full of the most venomous reptiles which infest the temperate zone. Last Sunday he and two companions were searching for sassafras root in the How timber and near Plymouth. While scraping away leaves from a small shrub he suddenly uncovered a wriggling, weltering mass of reptiles. The sight was a horrible one. All the bodies were intertwined, but in an instant the heads stood erect hissing and pufling. He did not pause to take a leisurely view, but hastily retreated and secured a stout stick. He then made his attack and laid out the entire bunch. When he came to count the snakes, after the slaughter, he found that there were ten. The longest measured about three feet, and the shortest was over two feet from ready to migrate. The most startling sort known as the blowing viper whose bite is almost certain death. The cannonade, so speaking, continued about ten minutes. During that time some twenty or twenty-five shots were fired. The reports were desfening and mus have been brought about by the use of heavy weapons. Many of the more timid citizens in the immediate locality of the commotion were alarmed beyond measure, supposing it to be a pitched battle of some sort. To Do Away with Appellate Court. The Indianapolis bar association has Reed. appointed a committee to secure the indorsement at the polls next November of the two proposed amendments to the constitution in which the lawyers of the state are especially interested. One provides that the legislature shall prescribe qualifications for admittance to the bar and the other provides that the legislature may increase the number of supreme judges to eleven, thus doing away with the appellate court. Both these proposed amendments have been passed by two general assemblies, and go to the people next November. It is the hope of the lawyers of Indianapolis that both political state conventions will indorse the amendments and the committee will suggest to party leaders that this be done.
